

MODULE – 24

LESSON - 2

Resume formats

There are several CV formats to choose. Select the kind that best presents your background and qualifications.

One is the chronological format . The chronological CV shows your career's progression and growth and the information moves from the beginning of your career to the present situation. Another format is one which focuses on skills, highlighting your most important skill areas and knowledge relevant to the given position. It is also called the functional format. In this format your key skills, knowledge and related accomplishments are organized and presented, citing relevant examples of effectiveness as proof .

The third format is one that combines both chronological and skills resumes. They start with a skills summary followed by a list of experiences with descriptions in reverse-chronological order.

There are also other formats like 'Targeted CV' which is written in a way that highlights skills, qualifications and experience that match the requirements of the advertised position.

However, please remember that it is ultimately your own objective and background that should guide you in selecting the best format for you.

Now let us see what should be included in the CV

Personal Details

Normally, every CV starts with this section. Your name, date of birth, address, phone number, email address, nationality and the like .Keep these details to the minimum. If you have your own web page or Blog include that (if it is good!).

Education – Briefly highlight qualifications : include type of degree, name of university, date of graduation, other degrees, relevant higher education coursework, ongoing professional education/training courses and studies abroad.

Work experience / work history

List your most recent experience first mentioning the employer, job title, and most important ,your achievements. Use short, straightforward sentences.

Next is relevant skills and experience . Include specific skills such as IT skills, communication skills , research abilities familiarity with statistics etc . Also mention current level of spoken/written fluency in languages.

Other interests

The employer will be interested in activities where you have shown leadership or responsibility or team work . Include those that connects with the work .If you have been involved in any type of volunteer work, do give details.

References – it is customary, although not obligatory, to provide names and contact details of one or two referees. Be sure to contact your referees in advance so that they will be prepared.

Hobbies – include only if it supports your job objective .

Membership of Associations

If you are a member of certain professional associations that will be relevant to the position you are applying for, include them.

Layout

The CV should be pleasing to the eye and the reader should be enticed to pick it up and read it. Therefore create a clear, easy to read layout.

Use margins ,minimum of one inch (1") . Create a well-balanced design. Use quality paper and traditional fonts (10-12 in size.)

The format should be well laid-out with clear headings and enough space to ensure that information is not overly cramped. Leave out any irrelevant material. Make sure your grammar and spelling are correct. Proof read it. Use the minimum amount of words to make the maximum impact.

The covering letter must be tailored to each job opportunity and individual company

Emailing CV

When you send CV through email (check whether the employer accepts it) send it as an attachment to the email in MS WORD format or in a known word processing programme. Put your covering letter as the body of your email.

When submitting a resume via an organization's website, use the formatting and display style recommended by the website.

Keep copies of all letters, applications forms, and CVs sent, and records of telephone calls and names of those you spoke to.
